Philo of Byzantium (c.280–c.220 BCE) created a famous automated theater box. Its figures presented a scene that modern scholars reckon ran perhaps for more than 15 minutes. This passage is a summary of the scenes that spectators saw in the automated box. It tells the story of the revenge of Nauplius, whose son, Palamedes, had been betrayed and murdered by the Greeks during the Trojan War. When the Greek fleet is returning from the Trojan War, Nauplius, with the support of the goddess Athena, uses a fake signal to lure ships into a devastating storm.

Philo of Byzantium (c.280–c.220 BCE) created a famous automated theater box that modern scholars reckon ran perhaps for more than 15 minutes. Another famous Greek engineer in antiquity, Heron of Alexandria, describes in detail how the automation worked. In this passage, Heron summarizes the scenes that spectators saw when the machine ran the story. It tells the story of the revenge of Nauplius, whose son, Palamedes, was betrayed and murdered by the Greeks during the Trojan War. When the Greek fleet is returning from the Trojan War, Nauplius, with the support of the goddess Athena, uses a fake signal to lure ships into a devastating storm.

Heron of Alexandria - Automata 2.22.3-6

Philo of Byzantium (c.280–c.220 BCE) created a famous automated theater box that modern scholars reckon ran perhaps for more than 15 minutes. Another famous Greek engineer in antiquity, Heron of Alexandria, describes in detail how the automation worked. In this passage, Heron summarizes the story that spectators saw when the box ran. It tells the story of the revenge of Nauplius, whose son, Palamedes, was betrayed and murdered by the Greeks during the Trojan War. When the Greek fleet is returning from the Trojan War, Nauplius, with the support of the goddess Athena, uses a fake signal to lure ships into a devastating storm.
